

David Ardia
Director, Digital Media Law Project at Harvard's Berkman Center for Internet and Society
Harvard Law School

David Ardia is a fellow at the Berkman Center for Internet & Society at Harvard Law School and the director of the Digital Media Law Project, which provides legal education, assistance, and other resources for individuals and organizations involved in online journalism and digital media.

Prior to coming to Harvard, he was assistant counsel at The Washington Post where he provided pre-publication review and legal advice on First Amendment, newsgathering, intellectual property, and general business issues. David also practiced law at Williams & Connolly in Washington, DC, where he handled a range of intellectual property and media litigation and performed pre-publication libel review for the National Enquirer and In Touch Weekly.

David's research focuses on examining the impact of new information technologies on law and society, particularly the question of how intermediaries shape the environment for speech and how legal and social forces act upon those intermediaries.